Resource Center for Your Disc Golf Course Project

Information is power with most of life's endeavors. Here, Dan shares some of the power with you, as he candidly offers the challenges and rewards that are part of any disc golf course design and installation project.

DO YOUR COURSE RIGHT!

So you want to build a disc golf course...

Congratulations! Since you've found your way to this section of our Web site, the odds are pretty favorable that you are interested in developing a disc golf course in your local or regional park. That's great news.

Disc golf is an increasingly popular form of "passive recreation" that you may know a lot or a little about. Either way, there is one thing I want you know to understand right now...once the word gets out about your interest in putting in a course, people will be coming out of the woodwork to get a piece of this project. All will have good intentions, but few will actually be qualified enough to bring the level of professionalism and design experience that my over 30 years in disc golf has afforded me.

The first thing one of my disc golf brethren will probably say about the project is, "This would be a great place for a disc golf course!" or "I'll do it for free!" By comparison, we will not TELL you anything about your prospective course...we'll ASK you first.

Significant issues like who you expect to use the course, who else uses the park, what's your timeline and budget for completion of the project are just a few examples of the types of questions we ask before we recommend anything! In fact, in a few cases, we've had to tell our clients that their park is not big enough for an 18-hole course, or that there are major safety problems inherent with where they want to the course to go. These are the advantages that you will receive from the vast experience our firm brings to the table. It's the difference between someone who tells you they have played a great deal of disc golf and someone who has built many of the courses those guys played on.

Listen...you don't have to believe a word that's on this Web site. You're right...we could write whatever we want on these pages...it's our site! But if you do nothing else on your visit to this site, you should do this one thing...fill out our Initial Consultation Form! Then it's up to us to prove it to you.

Thanks for giving us a chance. You will not be disappointed!
